California Missions Moment: An Epic beginning

The marathon challenge of planting a church in the city of San Francisco is the stuff of church planter legend. You'd be crazy to take another stab at it, lots of people told Ben and Shauna Pilgreen. "Sure, there were lots of fears embarking on this," the Louisiana native, Ben, acknowledged. "But our greatest fear - the one that overrode all the other concerns, especially about raising our three boys in the San Francisco public school system - was that maybe this was the call of God upon our life, and we might miss it. Our greatest fear was that we'd get to the end of our lives and regret that we never went for it. "And really, we've been just blown away so far."

Considering the uphill struggle so many new churches face in the fabled City by the Bay, "mind-blowing" might be a good description. Epic Church, as it's called, began two years ago when the Pilgreens plus three other couples relocated from Missouri, Alabama, Louisiana and Florida to the south of Market (SoMa) area of San Francisco. Why a team? Pilgreen explained: "More important to me than the geographical call was doing life and ministry and this church start with people we knew and loved and could trust, and who were also gifted with a calling. It was amazing that when we visited these friends, people we'd known for five, eight or 14 years, and shared our hope and vision, they all said yes." More of this article at www.calmissions.com
